

Resiliency in Youth with LGBTQ Parents by Johanna Pena

This research explores on the topic of LGBTQ families and their way on managing through adversities caused by being a different type of family. The overarching questions are whether having a powerful inner family dynamic will help children power through bullying that is brought onto them since one or both of their parents are LGBTQ, and how can these children overcome bullying from having an LGBTQ parent. This study is important because as LGBTQ families continue to grow, society must allow a safe space for all individuals and all different types of love and family. Participants in this study will fill out surveys to measure their family dynamic and their overall personal well-being. This research aims to focus on children of LGBTQ families and how to further help them in their unique adversities they may face because of their LGBTQ parent(s).
