

The aim of this research is to show that an on campus saving program will benefit the students enrolled both financially and beyond. It is our belief that there is a general lack of trust in financial institutions, lack of financial literacy, and lack of confidence that manifest to produce a major stumbling block for students wanting to build up their savings. Further, the lack of savings in combination with an on average higher than usual debt burden together cause students undue stress which can effect their studies. So far in the research endeavor I have analyzed 10 sources in relation to these issues, primarily focused on the trust and literacy side of things. It is my goal to gather even more pertinent information and then combine it with an analysis of data collected from student surveys.
