

How school type influences overall performance and enrollment

Carley Newbill, B.A. Candidate in English

There are various different types of schools in the United States of America, but the most common are public schools, private schools, charter schools, and home education or homeschools. While many studies have been conducted about public schools, it is only recently that the other three types of schools have gotten the same attention. There has been debate about which of these schools performs best and suits students, but that question is more complicated than it seems. All these schools have many things in common and many differences, yet those differences are what draw people to them. Public schools have a reputation for being “problematic,” which seems to be the reason as to why students attended private, charter, and home education. By examining various studies and articles, it is possible to compare these four types of schools and see the benefits.
